

By Jason Bruno

If you're like me, practicing is a passion. The desire to stay competitive and continue improving is never ending. Getting to the course or the range is often the biggest challenge for so many with busy schedules...that's where Rukket Sports factors in. We first noticed the "Haack Net" (designed by college coach Chris Haack) at the PGA Show in Orlando a few weeks back. Their golf nets are really easy to construct, within minutes of unpacking the box, I was hitting golf shots.

One of the things rarely mentioned when considering purchasing a golf net for your personal use is the amount of money saved on range balls (I only use premium urethane golf balls like Pro V1's when I'm practicing at home) and the convenience of having it all outside your doorstep

. . . Rain or shine, indoor or out you can practice as much as you'd like. The Haack golf net is constructed of five ply - 3/4 inch netting, steel and fiberglass frame. I especially liked the side nets, keeps golf balls from rebounding away from the hitting area.

My personal set up at the compound sits beside my synthetic putting green. I use it to work on fundamentals (I often use in junction with Zepp technology, that keeps track of swing plane, swing speed, and tempo) and just the overall process without constantly getting hung up on results. I prefer to start testing drivers here first to get a sense for how each feels before taking to the course for further testing. The Rukket net is sturdier than the previous set up I had installed previously, the only factor of concern is how well the frame will hold up to the South Florida elements as compared to the PVC unit I used previously.

If you want to practice on your terms, Rukket Sports has a variety of golf nets and accessories to help you set up your very own practice station.

<http://www.rukket.com/>